Databases for Australian Legal Research

Abstract

This article comprises a series of schedules listing databases that are useful for people conducting legal research in Australia. The article's objective is to make it easier for people who know approximately what they are looking for to identify the appropriate database or databases. That is, the article works primarily from target (for instance, Australian Secondary Legal Material) to database, without users having to check on a list of descriptions of databases to see which ones have information of the kind that they need.

Databases for Australian Legal Research¹

Catherine Vidler Smith² and John Prebble³

This article comprises a series of schedules listing databases that are useful for people conducting legal research in Australia. The article's objective is to make it easier for people who know approximately what they are looking for to identify the appropriate Database or databases. That is, the article works primarily from target (for instance, Australian Secondary Legal Material) to database, without users having to check on a list of descriptions of databases to see which ones have information of the kind that they need. Nevertheless, the first schedule, immediately below, works in the more conventional way: that is, it lists databases and gives a short description of their contents, though these contents descriptions are not its primary function. Rather, the task of the first schedule is to list abbreviations of database names used in the article and database uniform resource locators, known as 'urls'. The contents descriptions are secondary. Schedules after the first use abbreviations of database names both for conciseness and because a single database is often the appropriate source of several different kinds of information. This arrangement avoids repetition of lengthy database names and urls, though this saving comes at the expense of requiring readers to use the first schedule as a key to the article's abbreviations. Where a database is available on subscription only, the expression 'by subscription' replaces its url.

The authors have designed the article as a convenient compendium for teachers, librarians, practitioners, and students. While copyright resides with the authors, readers are welcome to copy the article with appropriate acknowledgement for their use, teachers to copy for students, or librarians for readers.
