The beauty of Bhutan

Mike Grenby
Bond University, Mike_Grenby@bond.edu.au

Follow this and additional works at: http://epublications.bond.edu.au/fsd_papers

Part of the Journalism Studies Commons

Recommended Citation

This Popular Press is brought to you by the Faculty of Society and Design at ePublications@bond. It has been accepted for inclusion in Faculty of Society and Design Publications by an authorized administrator of ePublications@bond. For more information, please contact Bond University's Repository Coordinator.
The beauty of Bhutan

Spectacular scenery heads the long list of highlights for visitors to this Himalayan kingdom, writes Mike Grenby

AFTER passing Mt Everest on the left, the Druk Air Airbus 330 weaves its way down a narrow mountain valley to land at Paro.

The few foreigners on board have little idea of what lies ahead, such as the legacy of a 15th-century mad monk named Lama Drupka Kuenley, whose phallus is symbolised very graphically on buildings to ward off evil spirits; a chain of luxurious yet local resorts surrounded by spectacular scenery; mummies with chilli, marijuana growing along the road being gathered as pig feed; countless stray dogs, itinerant road menders breaking stones along the one-lane highways, cliff-hugging monasteries, fortresses, a benevolent king who plans to abdicate in favour of democracy and the Gross National Happiness Index.

Welcome to Bhutan.

Tucked between Tibet and India, Bhutan has a population of about 690,000. Some two-thirds are subsistence farmers. 80 per cent live at least an hour's walk from a road and about half live more than a day's walk from a road.

Bhutan opened its doors to tourists in 1974 and although the annual limit of 2000 has been lifted, most Westerners consider it a new, exotic destination. Bhutan is trying to avoid the uncontrolled tourism that brought undesirable influences to Nepal, a few Himalayan mountain ranges away.

So far, the strategy seems to be working. Visitors pay upwards of US$200 a day, which includes all accommodation and meals, taxes and entry fees, a guide and driver. That tends to keep out backpackers but is quite reasonable by international travel standards.

Bhutan is not an ordinary place, said the award-winning writer Stan Armington, whose Lonely Planet Bhutan guide should be required reading for anybody planning to visit.

The country has one foot in the past and one in the future.

The past, set in spectacular scenery (elevation ranges from 100m in the south to peaks topping 7000m in the north) with the prayer wheels, prayer flags and philosophy of the country's Buddhist religion, is what attracts most visitors.

At Punakha, an almost sub-tropical area that makes you feel you are back in Queensland with bananas, bougainvillea, jacaranda and prickly pear cactus, you walk half an hour through two small villages and fields and along irrigation channels to the Chimi Lhakhang monastery, built by Lama Drupka Kuenley (1455-1529), the "mad monk" or "divine madman".

He gained notoriety through his outrageous, obscene, sexual, humorous, insulting behaviour — provoking people to discard their preconceptions about life and religion.

Childless women go to the temple to receive a blessing from the sexually active saint, whose phallus adorns many buildings in the area to protect them from evil spirits and/or as a symbol of fertility.

Hotel accommodation also comes in several versions: from basic guesthouses to the luxurious Amankora. Amankora's all-inclusive rates start at about $1200 a day and if you stay seven days, also include a tailor-made itinerary, private transport with guide and driver and a spa treatment.

I visited the four Amankora properties combined with a tour by Tshering Dorji, of Bhutan Scenic Tours (www.bhutanscenictours.com.bt).

Dorji took care of all the travel details including my visa and flight arrangements that must be made by a local travel agent or an organisation such as Amankora (toll-free 0011 800 2255 2626).

With up to five staff for every guest and 50sq m timbered rooms, Amankora has a different feel from most hotels.

"For example, while we do not have a formal reception or concierge desk," says general manager John Reed, "members of the lodge family can always be found in the living room or reached by phone."

You notice countless stray dogs, especially in the towns and villages. They often lie on the roads, along with cows.

Residents navigate the narrow winding roads with skill and, for a country with Asian/Indian influence, surprisingly infrequent horn-honking.

Pestilence breeds the marijuana that grows everywhere to feed their pigs. Itinerant workers from India and Nepal live in basic shelters along the roads they repair during the day.

You often see women breaking stones with sledgehammers to provide road material.

The king 50-year-old Jigme Singye Wangchuck, wants to introduce a constitution and democracy to Bhutan in 2008 — a move which worries many inhabitants who have become used to the benevolent monarchy in place since 1974.

He also introduced the concept of the Gross National Happiness Index to emphasise the importance of quality of life.

You can drive into Bhutan from India. But most visitors fly in on Royal Bhutan’s Druk Air, the only carrier, either from New Delhi/Calcutta or, because of better connections for most travellers, from Bangkok.

Economy return trips start from about $725.

Mike Grenby teaches journalism at Bond University on the Gold Coast.